

LOL → you even more money, which you could then spend on a few video games and not have the result of you living in your parents' basement. From my own experience, I know that sometimes I can't keep my money, for wanting a game and after that I regret it because I don't like the game or I think about all the other benefits I could have used. More times than not, you are not only spending money, but even a lifetime is handed to the cashier.

Bottom Bun? Kinda

Unhealthy. What sounds better? Exercising one hour or sitting in a chair playing video games for one hour? To most people exercising sounds the best. Health is a big factor in deciding to get video games. Even at the beginning of video games it says "WARNING! contents may be harmful to people with certain conditions." Most people shrug it off, but what do you do if you have those conditions? Don't think you're safe, because you don't have the conditions. Over-playing video games can cause eye strains, mental conditioning failures, and it can affect the way you think. From experience, I know eye strains do not only cause dry eyes, but they can also cause public interrogation. What's wrong with your eyes? Why are you doing that? So not only are video games not only physically unhealthy, but also mentally.

⊕ Bottom Bun

⊕ Even though there are reasons why you should play video games, there are many more reasons why you shouldn't. This is a big matter as even experts are researching. Douglas A. Gentile claims that violent video games cause "desensitization." With that in your mind, you will probably notice that
